Leading citizens called on Coleman and asked him to organize a safety committee. In twen ty-four hours he had five thousand men so well equipped that they cleaned out the sand-of mob in a pitched street battle and so terrorized Kearney that, although he had led his forces one night to the top of Nob hill, he did not dare to burn the houses of railroad millionnires as he had threatened. The secret of his weakness was that Coleman sent him word that he would be hanged within twelve hours of the time that he began this rioting. Nine years ago Coleman, who was always a stanch democrat, was suggested by the New York Sun for president. His name was received with favor, but the plan fell through because financial distress came upon Coleman, largely through the work of subordinates, and swept away his fortune. After paying forty cents on the dollar, to which the creditors agreed, he spent his remaining sixty per cent, and only last summer
